The UN body is likely to hold a vote next Tuesday on the draft resolution, which calls for Israel to immediately cease fire and to allow UN monitors, with access to Israeli civilian infrastructure, to ensure that no civilian casualties or damage remain. It also urges President Mahmoud Abbas and Palestinian Authority officials "to allow for the re-establishment to the Palestinian territories under civilian rule of the elected Palestinian Authority and to return all areas in the West Bank and Gaza to civilian administration.".. In case you were wondering (because our boy had some good answers for that question), the boy, who goes by "Jake", is the grandson of a NASA scientist, who is now dead at the age of 21. After talking to Jake, scientists told the report that he would need to remove his eyeball so his brain could become fully functional. The surgery will allow Jake to understand his surroundings, learn how to use the tools in his hands, and possibly even be able to speak to other people. As Jake explained, "If you take a tool and your mind is attached to the tool, that is when you learn things. I was able to figure that out on my own." According to the article, it would have taken the boy up to 16 surgeries to grow his eyeball, but Jake's mom says the boy "doesn't care any less about where his body comes from. He's still happy and has full physical intelligence." And it's not the brain you usually hear about when a child removes their eyeballs. Jake told the New York Times that, during surgery, the boy was held in a room for eight hours for months while his mother took him to a doctor where he was told to drink a strong red wine and eat something like a whole-grain loaf of bread. "His voice is not very good, and his speech isn't good," his mom told the New York Times. The mother said other than that, his brain was OK.
